

Narrator – It is a small office. A grand desk in the centre of the room occupies most of the space. 7.9 billion case files are scattered on the desk and on the shelf behind the desk. A person sits cross-legged on a revolving chair behind the desk, all day and night. And not anywhere on the face of this earth, not even where angels live, a place they call ‘heaven’, will you find someone who looks as enticing, as irresistible as this fine person who sits behind the desk. One look at that person’s magnetic eyes and you would not be able to take your eyes away from them. The seductive wink gives the final touch to an image worthy of the Gods.

A young boy trudges into the room, and seats himself opposite this person.

(Jack turns on his video)

Jack (breathlessly) – ‘Can I confide in you? Completely?’

Anger – Indeed sir, and I assure you nothing that passes between you and me today shall trickle out of this room.

Jack – My mother won’t let me play on my PS4, and I had completed all my homework. It had not even been four hours of gaming when my mother comes storming into my room, screeching about the state of humanity and today’s youngest generation...

Anger – Ay! Say no more son! Say no more! I know exactly how that feels. You see, when I was a child, I used to absolutely love candies. And like you, even I used to maintain a tremendous amount of self-control, allowing myself to only five candies a day. But even at that, my father would shriek and shout and yell at me, and confiscate all my candies.

Jack – But sometimes, I feel that perhaps my mother is right, perhaps four hours of screen time-

Anger – Stop right there, sir. You mustn’t let your confidence in yourself dwindle. You mustn’t let your enemies conquer you emotionally. That is how such people operate, sir, and you mustn’t give in to their traps. It is the worst kind of defeat. It is indeed a nasty, nasty business.

(He looks down upon his knees, clearly conflicted from the inside.)

Anger - Come on now! Four hours? I had rather be dead than be denied even four hours of leisure time. This is private invasion. I tell you, sir! That’s what it is! Aren’t you a man yourself? Can’t you take decisions for yourself now?

Jack – Hmm. I believe in you.

Jack (slowly rising) - Who is she to invade into my personal life? Who is she to command me to do things? I'm THIRTEEN!

Anger – Very good! Very good!

Jack – Who is she to tell me leave the phone? When she herself remains glued to the screen for eternity. Only I know how I spend my days, living under the constant terror of being screamed at, of being tormented, pestered, taunted eternally. Do I even have a life? I AM JACK HAMBOWER, AND I WILL NOT TOLERATE BEING TREATED LIKE THAT! I won three football competitions. Two debate competitions. I secured a second prize in a national quiz when I was a mere 7 years-old. JUST, WHERE DID I GO WRONG TO DESERVE SUCH A TREATMENT AT YOUR HANDS? Now tell me this!

Narrator – He rants on for another half an hour, confessing his deepest and darkest secrets, all the suppressed emotion.

Jack – Thank you for showing me the light. I was an ignorant and an immature fool. I have grown up now.

Anger – Bravo! Bravo!

(Jack turns off his video)

Anger (addressing the audience) – Huh! Another job well done! Another human set on the right track.

People seem to have an unusual liking for me. I guess it's just something in my nature, but I win people's hearts everywhere. Wherever I go. And I happen to go to a lot of places actually. I connect with some stranger on professional account, that person recommends me to others in his surroundings, and a never-ending cycle develops. And I'll admit, there's not one place on the face of this earth where I'm not recognized. And when I'll tell you my name, I bet my life on it, you'll recognize me too, and personally at that.

Narrator – It is not ten minutes after the boy has left, when an elderly-looking lady walks in.

(Morgana turns on her video)

Anger – Ah! Morgana! I have been expecting you!

Morgana (breathlessly) – As you instructed me to, I asked my son to leave his PS4 for some time, the damned thing! So, he called me, me, his mother, a monster!

Anger – Tsk! Tsk! Today’s children! So disrespectful! Yes Morgana! I completely understand. In fact, I have a thirteen-year-old myself. He’s the most hateful creature that was ever born. He gobbles down candy after candy. I try to stop him, but he never understands.

Morgana - What should I do with him? I don’t trust anyone as much as I trust you.

Anger – Well, haven’t I trained you well enough Morgana? Are you not such an accomplished parent already?

Morgana – You’re right. Who is he to shout at me like that? Would he have won those football matches at all, if I hadn’t forced him to join the school’s football team? AND HE DARE THROW THAT IN MY FACE AS IF IT WAS ALL HIS DOING! HE DARE DISRESPECT ME! I, who won six debating competitions in my youth. I, who was the national topper in my engineering exams! I, MORGANA HAMBOWER! I WILL NOT TOLERATE BEING TREATED LIKE THAT AT THE HANDS OF MY SON.

Anger - Good job, Morgana!

(Morgana turns off her video)

Narrator – Morgana storms out of the room, and the person behind the desk sits back on the chair, content with a good day’s work.

Anger (addressing the audience) – There’s nothing in this world that pleases me more than to watch a family break-down. I said before that I win people’s hearts. I’ll elaborate. I win people’s hearts, I take over their emotions, I conquer their minds. I cloud their brains, working my magic upon the weakest of their points; their insecurities and their feelings of guilt. I thoroughly handicap their ability to think sensibly. And then, I offer them refuge. A place where they are never wrong, where no one can blame them of anything. And they walk into my outstretched arms. As readily as a baby does into his mother’s.

Indeed, I am inevitable. For I am bringer of destruction. Harbinger of strife. Augury of hostility and war. I am born of hatred and profess hatred. I am vanity. I am conceit. I am human Anger.

Thunderclap